Thanks to its recently approved acquisition of Dejour Enterprises' uranium assets in Saskatchewan's Athabasca Basin, Titan Uranium now controls one of the largest land positions in that prolific uranium district.

The Dejour additions to Titan's Castle North and Castle South properties give the company an impressive 1.44 million acres of prime uranium real estate. It's a land package that encompasses all six of Saskatchewan's conductive belts and over 300 line kilometers of basement conductors.

Titan currently has C$10 million on hand to begin an ambitious, C$20 million probing of its claims in the Athabasca and Thelon Basins. Plans for 2007 call for 13,000 meters of drilling over 51 holes within the two uranium districts.

Kicking off this year's program is a 3,000-meter testing of the Castle South project, located in the southwest Athabasca. Drilling now underway will attempt to access the Saskatoon Lake Conductor that traverses Castle South at depths of 600 to 650 meters.

Once completed, Titan will begin drilling the Carlson Creek property, located 20 kilometers northeast of and along trend with the McArthur River mine, an operation responsible for 18% of the world's uranium production.

That 1,500-meter campaign will utilize the results from a recent airborne VTEM survey, which turned up a three-kilometer-long basement conductor. It will attempt to isolate cross-cutting features believed to emanate from the Paul Bay (16 million pounds U₃O₈) structure.

Like Khan, Titan Resources has benefited from the uptick in uranium stocks due to the Cigar Lake accident. The post-disaster fallout sent Titan's share price as high as C$3.13 before the slow season for resource stocks kicked in and the share price pulled back to the C$2.00 mark. It has since bounced back nicely and is now trading comfortably in its current range.

At these prices, Titan looks like a relative bargain, especially when you consider that it has a 13,000-meter drilling program on tap for 2007. It looks ripe for accumulation.
